Installation of West Park sculpture completed

City's percent for art program supports Ann Arbor artist

Ann Arbor, MI – The Ann Arbor Public Art Commission would like to announce that two 11' high steel sculptures, entitled "TREEform", by artist Traven Pelletier, have now been installed at West Park. Funded by Ann Arbor's percent for art program and part of the city's renovation of West Park, this public art project complements overall plans for the renovation, which addresses storm water issues and creates new pathways, improved access to the park, a renovated parking area, and concrete seat walls built into the hillside to accommodate better viewing of events at the park band shell.

The park was chosen for public art because it is centrally located and serves a broad section of the community. The installation is in keeping with the natural environment theme of the park's renovation and the overall goals of the project. The city will dedicate the sculpture as part of the grand opening for West Park, expected some time in the spring of 2011.

Pelletier was chosen through a competitive process following a call for art to Michigan artists. In designing the pieces, Pelletier found that the huge old oaks were the most inspiring natural elements in the space. "The sculptures were designed to be large enough for people to sit under and enjoy while not competing too much with the overall area as a theater space. They are meant to "cap" the audience area and create a tie between the surrounding natural elements and the bandshell, both in form and color. The colors were chosen both to be striking and beautiful in the sunlight on the hillside, as well as to play with an earth-tone and a metallic color that would unify the symmetry of the industrial material, the playfulness of the piece in the theater space, and the natural theme of a tree's form." Pelletier specialized in fine art, sculpture, and landscape design and has received numerous grants for his community ecological arts projects. He lives and works in Ann Arbor, Michigan, and is co-owner and designer at Lotus Gardenscapes, Inc.

Pelletier has enlisted the help of many local businesses to create the piece. Lotus Gardenscapes donated both equipment and stone to integrate with the bench area. Rich Cox of Orion Auto in Ann Arbor, donated his time and space to fabricate the piece collaboratively with Traven and another Local Artist Tad McKillop. Dave Palermo of Palermo's Collision in Whitmore Lake has created a unique and beautiful copper fade color scheme and painted both pieces. Nick Lawler of SDI in Ann Arbor provided structural design and drawings for fabrication. A-1 Roll of Mount Clements MI provided rolling facilities and expertise to create the bent tubular steel for the piece.
