On-street snow parking ban

On Sunday, Jan. 25, the City of Ann Arbor called its first on-street snow parking ban in more than 22 years. The ban was activated because packed snow had built up on many residential streets — a situation that would have been made even more challenging with the additional 4–6 inches of snow expected Sunday into Monday.

Although the ban was not accompanied by ticketing or towing, residents responded beyond expectations by moving vehicles off the street. Thanks in part to this cooperation, dedicated city public works crews — working very long hours and even facing some equipment challenges — were able to plow streets curb to curb by Monday evening.

The city is grateful to all who took the time to move their vehicles, helping to make snow removal more efficient. Much appreciation also goes to city crews for their tireless efforts before, during and after the storm.

With more than two decades since the last ban, this was a learning opportunity for both the community and city staff. And since it won't be the last, residents are encouraged, in the meantime, to learn more and, most importantly, sign up for on-street-snow parking ban alerts at www.a2gov.org/snowparking.
